The aim of this study was to systematically review the evidence for the effectiveness of topical glucocorticosteroids in the treatment of erosive lichen planus. An independent literature search was conducted to identify controlled studies of topical glucocorticosteroids for the treatment of erosive lichen planus. Seven double-blind, placebo-controlled, parallel studies on topical glucocorticosteroids for the treatment of erosive lichen planus were identified. The studies used oral or topical glucocorticosteroids, and six of the studies used a placebo control. The studies were generally methodologically poor and used treatment courses of between seven and 26 weeks. Of the six studies using placebo, three reported a statistically significant (P
